

What's the difference between

High School

- In high school, parents or high school teachers might remind you of assignments, help you prioritize, or offer support if needed.
- In high school, you may not need to study frequently, and it's often possible to complete assignments at the last minute and still earn a good grade.
- In high school, early low test scores often have little impact—homework, classwork, and extra credit can boost your final grade.
- In high school, attendance is strictly monitored and usually mandatory. If a teacher is absent, a substitute typically steps in to ensure the class continues as scheduled.
- In high school, students schedules are created for them. Students are normally in school up to seven hours a day, Monday - Friday.

College

- In college, you're responsible for managing deadlines and reaching out to professors when needed—check-ins are rare.
- College courses often require 2-3 hours of study per day each—more time and effort than high school work.
- College exams are few, cover large amounts of material, and rarely shift for outside events. They carry significant weight in your final grade, with limited chances for extra credit.
- Attendance may not be required in every class, but missing it can hurt your grade and performance. If class is canceled, it usually just resumes at the next scheduled time.
- College schedules are flexible. You may have long breaks or days off, with class time varying per week.
